Practical Uses Vol. 1: Innovation

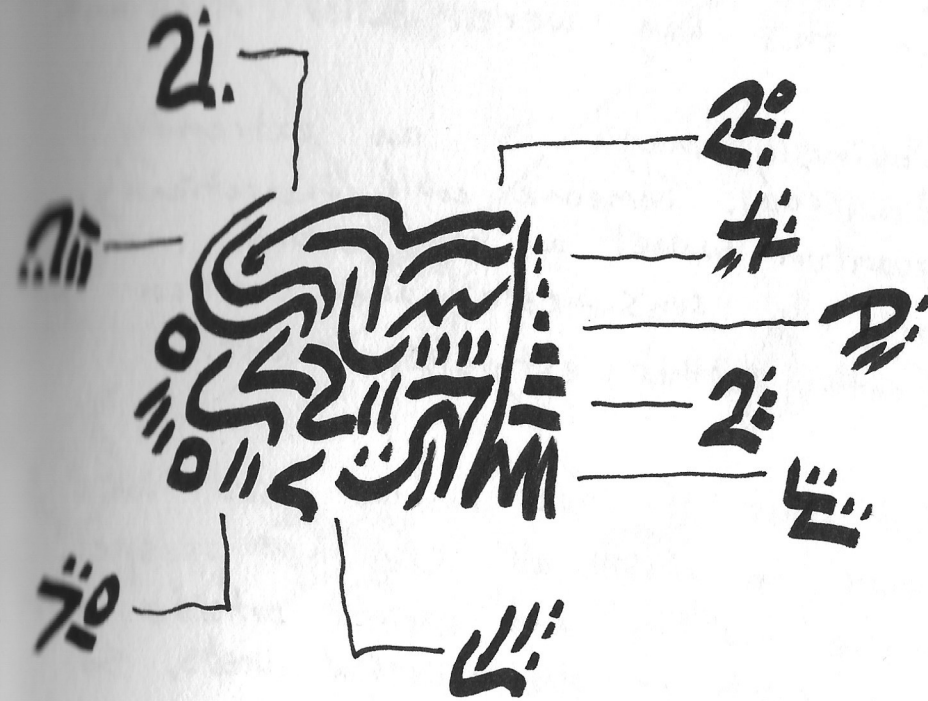

This notebook, the first in a series of many, serves as a guide in the use of the 'innovation' marking. For more information about Curious Markings, please visit <https://curiousmarkings.com>

My first experiment is to solve what could eventually be Man's greatest challenge; colonizing star systems outside our own. By focusing my will on the innovation marking, I've tapped into the schematics of ancient alien technologies that exist somewhere else in this universe. On the next page are the schematics.

One interesting thing to note is that the system seems to be partially fueled by an organic being's primal fear of the vast, chaotic unknown of the universe. As such, it is advised that some travellers be sedated so that they can be used as fuel from the trip home.

If this doesn't make sense, that's okay. Only those who have travelled the cosmos understand. And yes, we are quite smug about it.

Handwritten symbols in a stylized, cursive script, arranged in three rows. The symbols are composed of various geometric shapes, including circles, lines, and dots, with some having small vertical or horizontal strokes extending from them.

I propose that our brains are immensely complex quantum computers. I think these computers can manipulate the universe at a quantum level. In old times this was called magic. The people who could harness their brains in this way were called magicians.

Obviously, magic is an extremely dangerous. Someone could, theoretically, quantum tunnel a few subbed inches of the sun's core and summon upon Earth another extinction event.

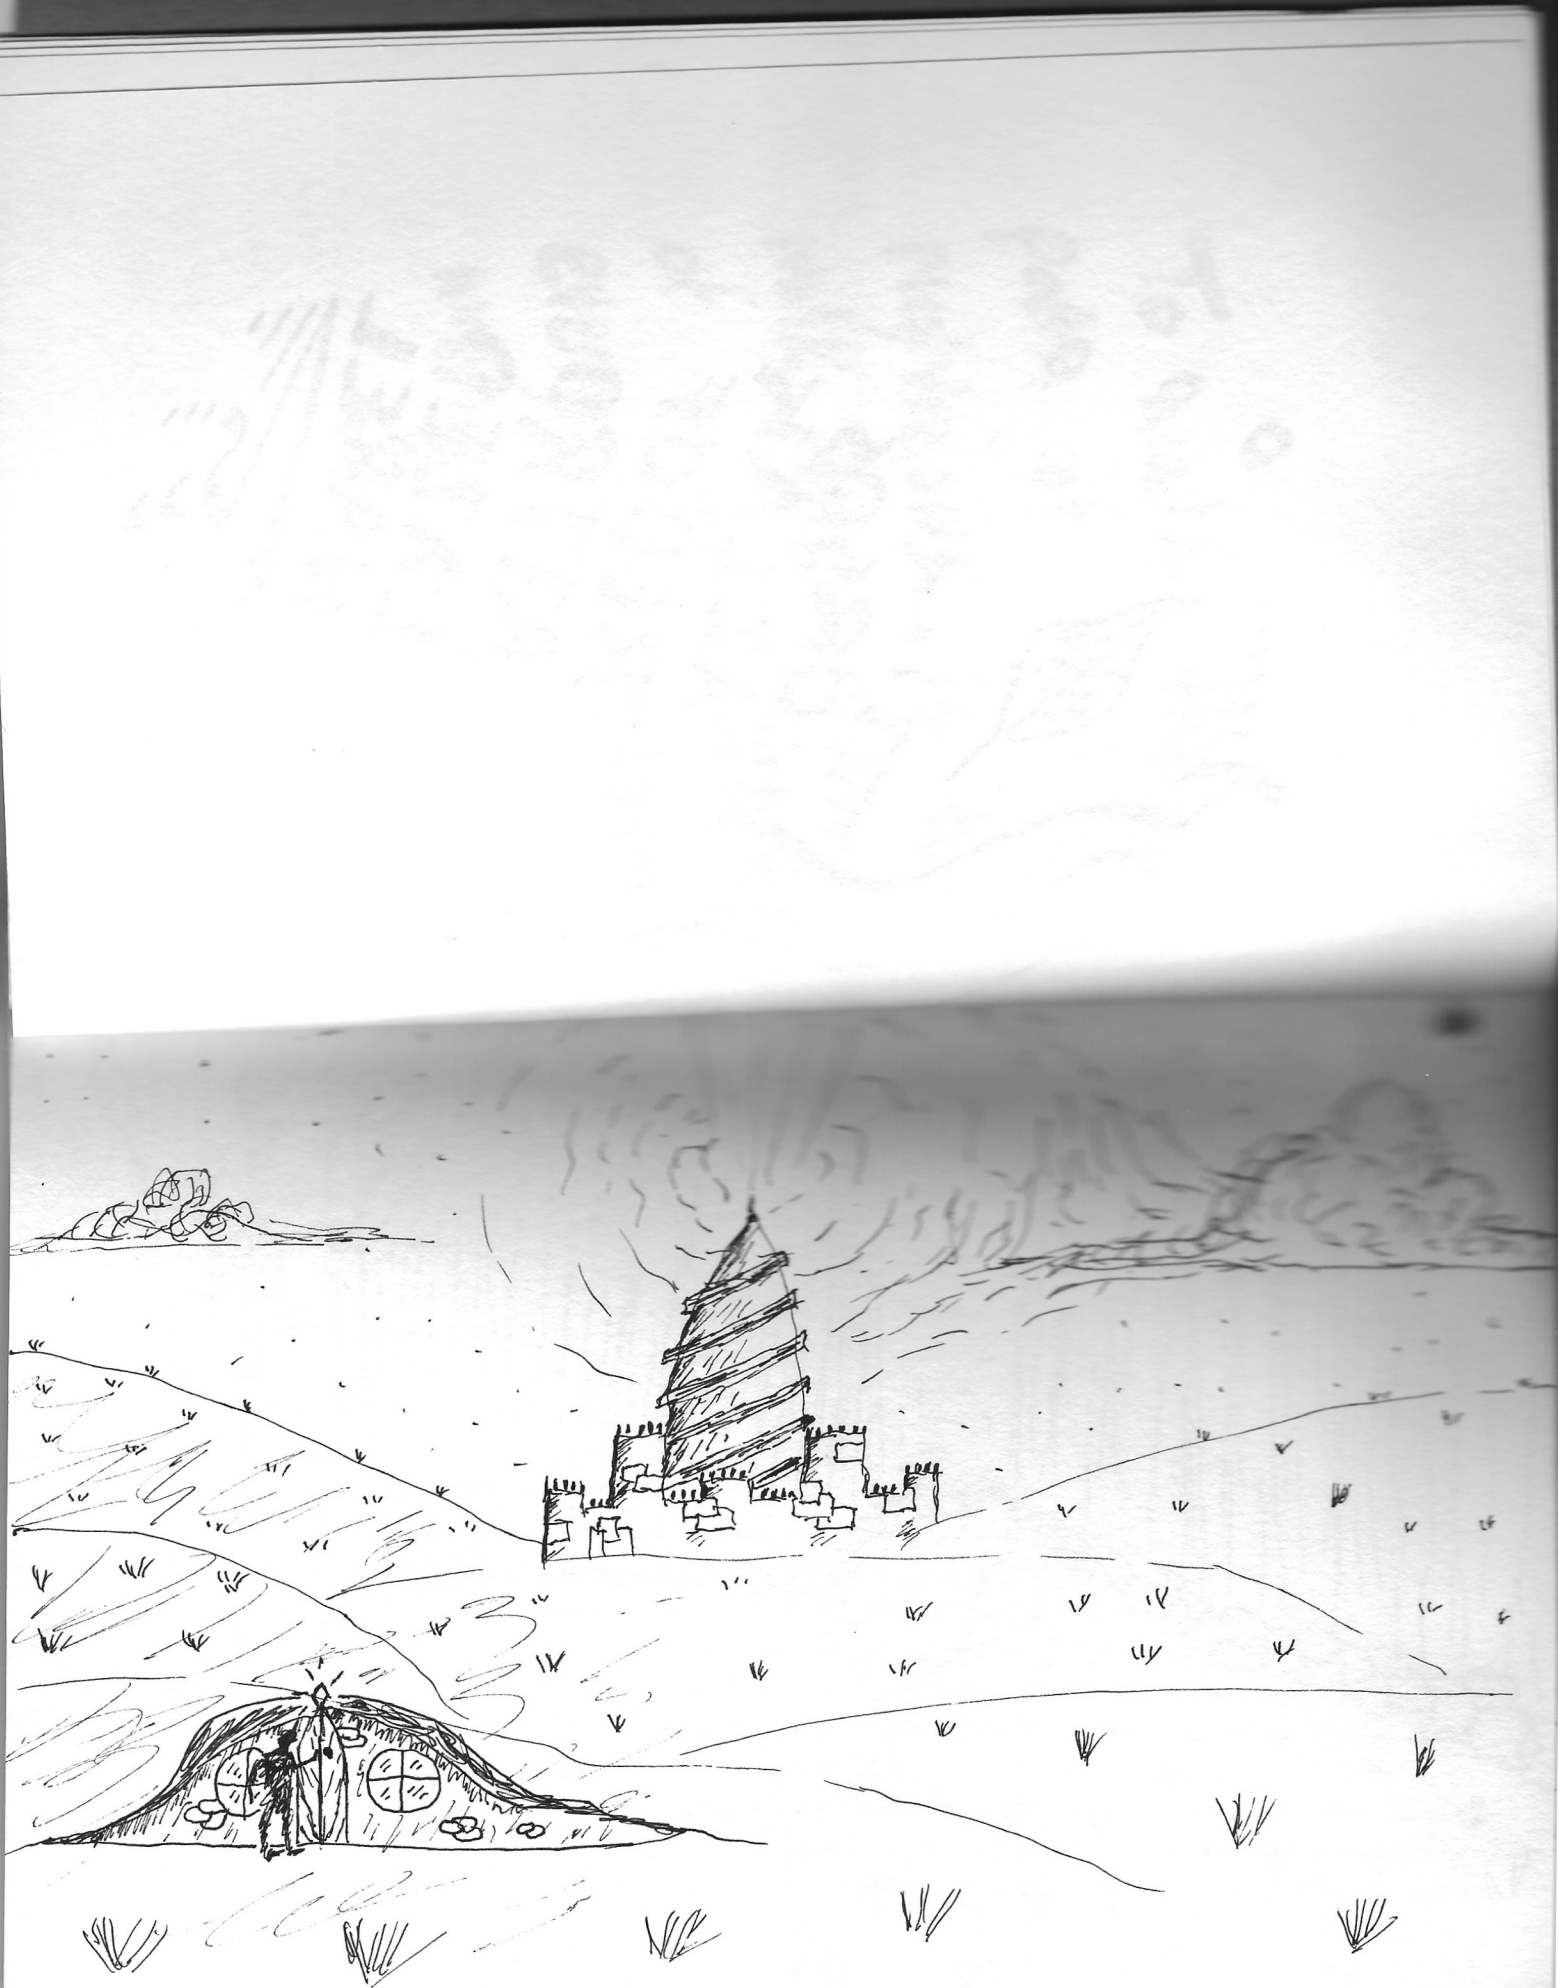

But what if we instead used this power to allow all life to prosper, thrive, multiply, and expand outside our own neck of the universal woods, so to speak?

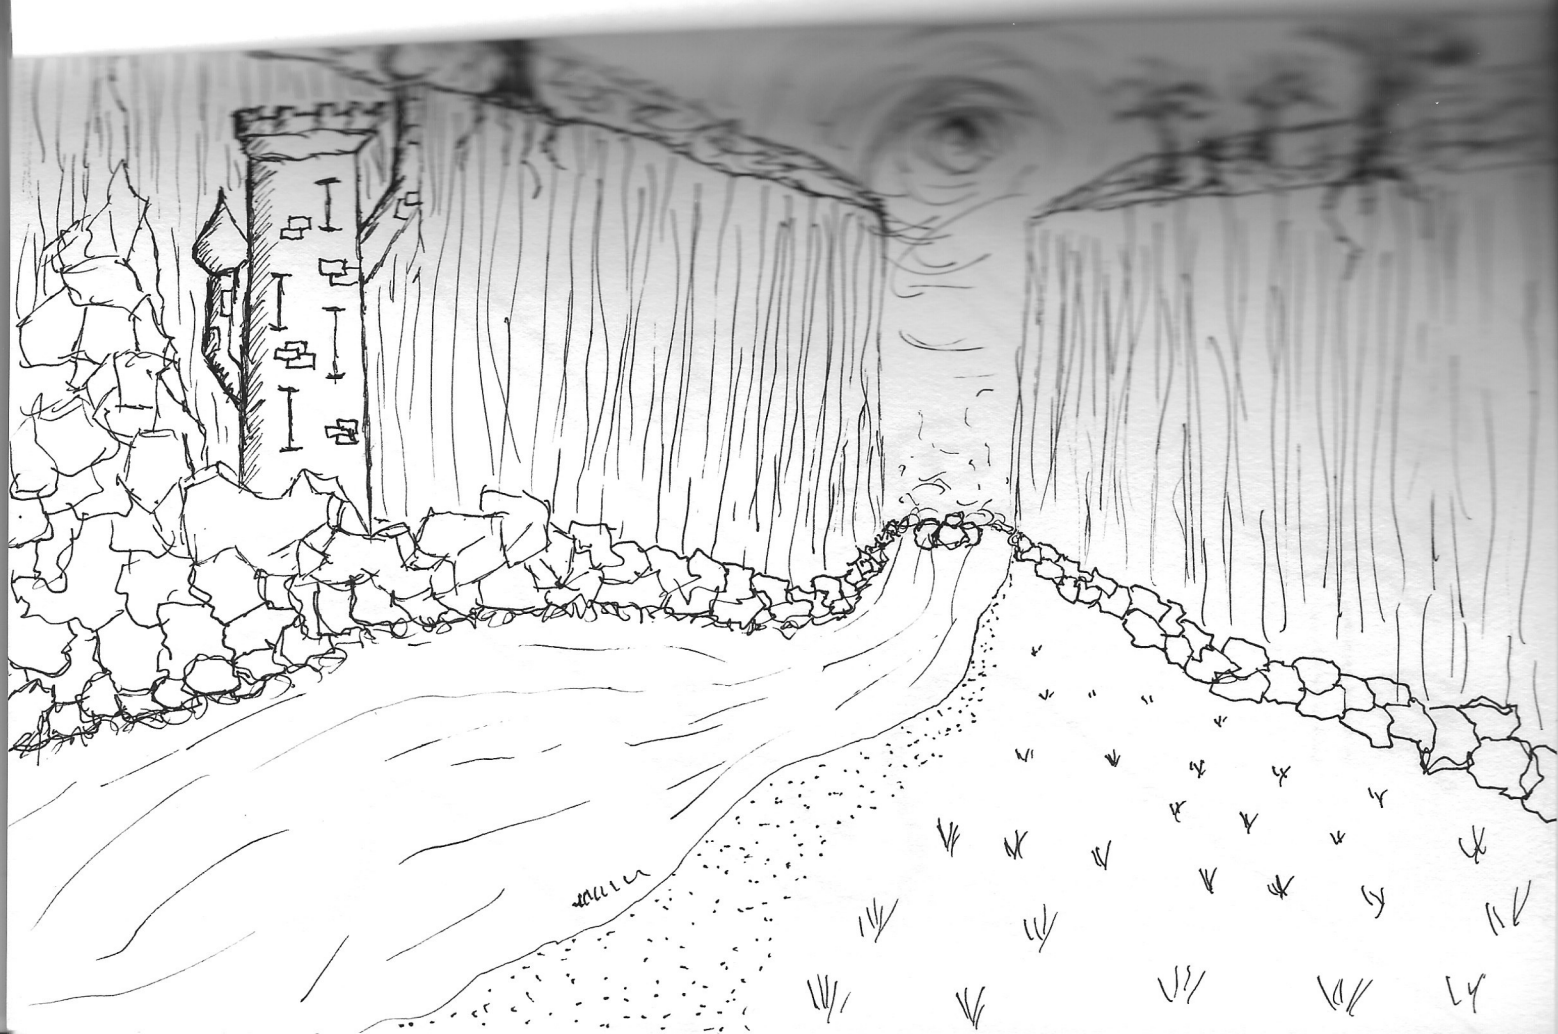

The next page is a formula to unleash your own magical powers. Remember, to love is to know. Knowledge is power, as Say. With infinite love comes infinite power.

To walk the path of the righteous is to walk the path of tyranny; eventually everyone is proven wrong.
